Welcome!

Congratulations – you are thinking of going to college! If you have a disability, you might be wondering what changes to expect. Each college is different, but all schools have something in common: They cannot discriminate against anyone due to a disability. U.S. schools are responsible for making their courses, campuses, activities, and services accessible to people with disabilities. This guide will help you understand the laws and policies affecting college students who have disabilities so you can make the most of your time there!

About Granite Edvance

Granite Edvance (formerly The NHHEAF Network) helps NH students prepare for college and careers. Our counselors share their knowledge through workshops, presentations, and individual appointments, helping thousands of students every year. We make college and career planning as easy as possible so that students can reach their goals with confidence and excitement. We also work with school counselors, colleges, and community and business partners to reach as many students as we can. All NH students are welcome to use our services at no cost!

What's Inside

This guide will walk you through what you can expect when transitioning to college. We'll talk about your rights, how to request accommodations from a college, where to find additional resources, and much more!

Accessibility at College

Your rights will still be protected when you go to college, but you will see some changes.

There are different accessibility laws for college than for public schools. You should also know that you – the student – will be responsible for getting what you need in college.

College Accessibility Offices

Public and private colleges and universities have staff who approve accommodations and services to students with disabilities. This office will have different names at different schools, including Campus Accessibility or Disability Services. You can find the name used by each school on their webpage by searching the term “disability” or “accommodation.”

Accommodations

Accommodations are changes to the tasks, environment, or the way things are usually done to make sure individuals with disabilities have an equal opportunity to participate in academic programs. There are many examples, including wheelchair ramps, large print, or sign language. Accommodations are a big part of how colleges provide equal access to campus resources.

Contacting Accessibility Services

Any student who has a concern about accessing a classroom or other physical space on campus or the materials or information in a class should discuss this with the Accessibility Services Office. If you have a diagnosed disability that affects your daily life or you have had an IEP or 504 in high school, you have a right to access classrooms and all physical spaces as well as educational offerings.

Types of Disabilities

A disability is any physical or mental limitation that affects one or more major life activities, such as caring for yourself, walking, seeing, hearing, speaking, breathing, learning, or working. There are several categories of disabilities:

- Cognitive / Learning
- Physical / Mobility
- Medical
- Visual / Hearing
- Psychological
- Communication

Laws and Rights

IDEA

In public K-12 schools, educational rights are protected by the Individuals with Disabilities Education Act (IDEA). This law governs how states and public agencies provide early intervention, special education, and related services.

ADA

Students with disabilities in post-secondary education are protected by the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). Public and private colleges/universities are required to offer accessibility services and remove barriers to learning. However, these changes cannot cause a “fundamental alteration of a recipient’s program or impose an undue burden.” The law requires colleges to provide effective accommodations, not the best or most expensive accommodations.

Question	IDEA (Public Schools K-12)	ADA and Section 504 (Qualifying Post-Secondary Schools)
Who is affected?	Children with disabilities, until they graduate from high school or age out.	Anyone with a disability, as long as they are “otherwise qualified” to attend school.
What rights are guaranteed?	Access to free, appropriate public education.	Protection from discrimination because of a disability.
How is a disability assessed?	The school is responsible for identifying and evaluating the disability.	Student must provide proof/documents about their disability. Different schools have different requirements.
How do accommodations get assigned?	The school creates the Individualized Learning Program (IEP), listing accommodations and modifications (if any).	The student must request “reasonable accommodations” and the school must ensure equal access to education for the student.*
What about special equipment and services?	The school must provide special equipment and services for students who need them.	Some schools may provide some adaptive equipment for educational purposes, but students must provide their own “individually prescribed devices” and “personal aids and services.”
What is the parent/guardian’s role?	Parents/guardians work closely with the school.	Students who are over 18 are adults and make their own decisions.

*ADA and Disabilities

The ADA does not protect all people who have a disability. The disability must “substantially limit” their ability to perform one or more major life activities.

Getting Started

Preparing and asking questions early will help you transition to college life smoothly.

Transition Planning

Transition planning means thinking about life after high school. What needs will you have? What strengths and skills will you need? It's important to start planning before graduation. In New Hampshire, high school students receiving special education services must begin planning at age 14. A thorough transition plan should include, among other things:

Student Participation

The student should be part of the meetings so they can voice their individual needs and wants. When the student turns 18, they are legally in charge of their transition plan and make all decisions about it (unless another legal arrangement is made).

Post-Secondary Goals

These goals are not just about learning. They should also cover life skills, job options, housing, and transportation.

Summary of Performance

This replaces an IEP. It should include academic performance and progress towards academic goals and life goals.

Questions to Ask Colleges Before Applying

You will be making a big decision when you decide to apply to college. Asking questions about accessibility will help you understand how the college will handle your needs. Each school is going to address your disability in its own way. Here is a list of possible questions to ask during an inquiry meeting:

Getting Started

If I need accommodations, when should I start the process?

What types of documentation does the school need?

Can I meet with college staff who work with students with disabilities before I enroll?

Course Load and Graduation Time

Can students with disabilities get a reduced course load?

How does this affect things like financial aid and graduation date?

Can students with disabilities register early?

Housing

Will my disability affect my on-campus housing options?

Student Groups

Are there special groups to help students with disabilities network with each other on campus?

Are there student leadership/mentoring programs for students with disabilities?

Support Services

What support services are available to students?

Does the campus have specific services for students with my disability?

Applying to College

When deciding on a college, keep in mind you will be evaluated just like any other applicant and will have to meet the same admissions requirements. The admissions staff will look at your transcript, GPA, class ranking, essay, and other required materials. A school cannot ask you anything about a disability any time during the application process.

Disclosing Your Disability

There are some reasons you might want to tell the college about your disability. It can help them understand why something is difficult for you, such as a certain class. It can also show them how you have learned to adapt and succeed.

Setting Up Accommodations

If you need accommodations in college, you must tell them about your disability and be ready to provide documentation. You are the one who has to ask for the accommodation. A staff member will review your request and your documentation. If they confirm a disability, they will talk with you about accommodations.

Remember, the accommodations you had in high school may not be the same in college. There may be more than one way to accommodate a student's needs. The college staff will listen to what you want, but they might meet your need in a different way than you requested.

This process is private. If you need accommodations for one or more classes, those accommodations will be shared with your instructors, but that is the only information they will see. The details of a disability are not shared with anyone unless the student chooses to share.

Examples of Accommodations

- Sign language interpreters
- Copies of class notes
- Audio recording of class lectures
- Test taking accommodations: extra time, a less distracting environment, repeated instructions
- Physical accommodations such as adjustable desks
- Large print or Braille, or screen readers
- Ability to take breaks during class

Self-Advocacy

Self-advocacy means speaking up for yourself. The first step in self-advocacy is self-understanding. You should understand your disability and how it may affect your education and career choices. You should understand what you're good at and what is difficult for you. You should understand your needs and the accommodations that can help meet those needs. Knowing all these things will make it easier to speak up if your needs aren't being met or if changes need to be made.

In college, there are no case managers to set up accommodations and check on your progress. You are responsible for asking for help. You do not need to share any information about your disability with your instructor if you don't want to. But it's important to ask questions and advocate for yourself when you need help.

Temporary Disabilities

Colleges can provide accommodations for temporary conditions as well.

Some disabilities are temporary, meaning they will go away. These include broken bones, recovery from surgery, some physical illnesses, and some psychological conditions. Some colleges provide accommodations for temporary disabilities that may affect your academic progress. Students with temporary disabilities should contact the accessibility office on campus to discuss their needs. The office may request documentation for the disability. Students need to communicate with each instructor about their needs and accommodations, such as missing class or turning in assignments.

Examples of Accommodations for Temporary Disabilities

- Assistive technology or personal help with reading, writing, or recording class lectures
- Re-scheduling a missed test or project
- Possible extra time for a test or a different environment for the test
- Preferential parking or seating

Resources

There are many sources of support available. Taking advantage of them can help you succeed.

Additional College Services

Living independently at college can be overwhelming at first. Most colleges offer services to help with many different challenges. These services are available to all students, not just students with disabilities. Here are some examples:

Academic Resource Center

Offers academic coaching, professional and peer tutoring, academic reading strategies, organization and time management skills, general study strategies and study habits for specific classes.

Residential Services

Assists with housing and roommate issues.

Campus Dining Services

Dietary experts can help students with food allergies, sensitivities, and other special needs.

Counseling

Provides short-term assistance with stress management, home-sickness, anxiety, and other mental health needs.

Health Centers

Help with illness, injuries, and medications. Provides referrals to area healthcare providers for more serious conditions.

Religious Centers

Offers resources, events, and gathering spaces for students of various religious faiths.

Financial Aid and Business Offices

Assist with school tuition/billing inquiries, financial aid questions, scholarship information, and post-college loan repayment information.

Information Technology Support

Supports supplied technology like dorm internet service and computer labs, and answers general technology-related questions.

Career Centers

Help students explore college majors, careers, internships, and post-graduation employment. Helps with skills such as resume writing, interviewing, and evaluating job offers.
